
Halftime Newsletter December 2010

When Your Second Half Dream Fails...

By Lloyd Reeb

Author of The Second Half - a coffee table book helping couples build a second half dream together.

When Ted Boers first shared his dream project with me I was blown away with the boldness of his faith and the size of the impact it would likely have in Haiti. As a successful business guy and a thinking Christian he was using his experience and network to acquire a large track of land in Haiti with pristine ocean front with the idea of creating a planned development that would provide a safe landing spot for Haitian Americans: a self-contained community for them to move back to their homeland and begin to constructively rebuild the economy and infuse the culture with Christian hope and values. With 10,000 acres in hand, and, after miraculously finding ample fresh water for the entire development and having invested millions of dollars, their dream was stalled by corruption and bureaucracy.

I interviewed Ted last year and he was discouraged and disillusioned. His heart was asking a question every Halftimer needs to be prepared to answer: "If I offer God my best talent, my time and my treasure does he have the right to apparently squander it?" Read, in Ted's own words, what he has been learning since then:

"Why would a good God allow a project like this to fail? Why doesn't God answer the prayers of the Haitian people? Is it really true that there is a God who listens to and answers prayer? I wrote in my journal: 'God does not appear to be near, or anywhere. He does not appear to be answering my prayers. He does not appear to be providing any direction. It appears that He has taken things away but has not provided anything new in its place. Does God really exist?' I started to read Christian books in an effort to bolster my faith. I read:

The Case for Christ by Lee Strobel

The Reason for God by Timothy Keller

Mere Christianity by CS Lewis

Basic Christianity by John Stott

Jesus Rediscovered by Malcolm Muggeridge

All this reading led me to conclude that you cannot prove the existence of God anymore than you can prove the non-existence of God. But I did conclude that the evidence for the existence of God seemed to be quite overwhelming. The faith/doubt index began to tilt up. Then God ironically used an atheist and the London Times to take my faith to the next level. Matthew Parris is a writer and a self described atheist who grew up in Malawi, Africa. He currently lives in the UK but visits his home country frequently. I came across an article he had written for the London Times where he made the following statement; "As an atheist, I truly believe that what Africa needs is God." That statement haunted me. I couldn't get it out of my mind. Parris went on to say: 'In Africa, Christianity changes people's hearts. It brings a spiritual transformation. The rebirth is real. The change is good.'

It wasn't long after reading the Parris article that I wrote in my journal: 'I truly believe that Haiti needs God...' and 'I truly believe that Ted needs God.'"

What I have been learning along this journey with Ted, is what one writer wrote in the 12th century ... "God doesn't need me, He wants me." Could it be that part of our journey from success to significance is about the heart journey, discovering that God is weaning us not just from success, but even from our dreams of significance to be satisfied with Him and where He wants to go together? Priceless.

P.S. If you would like to interact with Ted about his journey or his project email him at:

tab@datacompusa.com